

Reflection & Professional Growth

Edward Wonder Mordey

My IT497 capstone brought together my Professional Growth and Spiritual Progression portfolios. It helped me examine both my technical development and the values that guide how I use technology, communicate, and serve others.

Three lessons I am taking forward

1. Ethical judgment belongs in technical work.

A working solution must also consider privacy, fairness, accuracy, and its effects on people. Exploring an ethical dilemma helped me recognize competing values and think beyond whether a task is technically possible.

2. Feedback makes work more useful.

Instructor feedback challenged me to involve other people in testing my portfolio and show how I responded. Peer discussion also reinforced the importance of explaining dashboards and technical results for nontechnical audiences.

3. Faith and professional responsibility grow together.

My faith encourages integrity, patience, humility, and service. These values shape how I handle information, work with others, and respond to setbacks. Strong work also requires dependable planning, communication, and follow-through.

What I will do next

I will seek feedback earlier, break major assignments into smaller milestones, and leave time for revision. I will continue developing SQL, Power BI, Tableau, and IT skills while making my findings clearer and more useful to the people who rely on them.

Academic context

My original reflection records 909 of 921 points (98.7%) across Weeks 1-6. This is a self-reported course-period result, not a final course grade or an independently verified transcript. The reflection also acknowledges late submissions and identifies more consistent planning as a development priority.

Adapted from Edward Mordey, IT497 Capstone - Final Reflection and Future Pathways (original 21-page reflection). This condensed portfolio edition summarizes personal learning; it omits devotional quotations, external-source discussions, and submission-only documentation notes.